B.

Jennifer is an anchor of the morning news on SLOT TV. She got an email from a man who said that she was too heavy to be an anchor. She should leave her job and get thinner. Also, the man posted the letter on the Internet and other people attacked her with the same bad words. She needs the Internet at her work, so it's not possible for her not to use it. All made Jennifer down and sad.

Isn't Jennifer's case common? Yes, it is, and it is called cyberbullying. Many students and office workers are being bullied at school, at their workplace or on the Internet. They can do nothing to those bullies. They can't stand out to fight back, and they feel very troubled. This leads to the fast growing of bully.

What can they do? First, tell the teachers or their supervisors what happens. Second, they can take action to keep themselves from being bullied. For example, Jennifer can write a letter to tell the public whether she is heavy or not has nothing to do with her work. And she can ask the man to say sorry, or she will take legal actions soon. As for students, they can ask their parents and teachers for help. If they don't, their family and friends may not know they are leading a terrible life. It is time to say "no" bullying.
